

Aztlan Reconquista

The term "Aztlan" refers to a mythical territory including all of California, Utah, and Nevada, as well as parts of Colorado, Arizona, New Mexico, and Wyoming. As a direct result of the Mexican-American War (1846–1848) and subsequent Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, the United States paid for and legally acquired all of this land from Mexico. However, most Mexicans believe that they not only have a right to that land, but also that they have a responsibility to reclaim it for their country. Unlike our fully assimilated European ancestors, millions of illegal immigrants are pouring across our porous borders not in an attempt to enrich our nation and economy, but as a means to take back land that they view as rightfully theirs. Are they now, as so many of them publicly claim, trying to repossess it (i.e., reconquista)?

Are they now trying to reclaim it (i.e., reconquista)?

"Demographically, socially, and culturally, the reconquista of the Southwest United States by Mexico is well under way," said Harvard University professor Samuel P. Huntington (The Washington Times, April 16, 2006).

According to a poll by Zogby, the official North American and South American political polling agency for Reuters, 58% of Mexicans polled believe "the U.S. Southwest rightfully belongs to Mexico, having been stolen from Mexico in the 1800's and 57% believe Mexicans have the right to enter the U.S. whenever they please." (Investor's Business Daily, April 11, 2006)

It is undeniable. America is becoming browner by the minute and White Americans are quickly becoming a minority in the land our ancestors fought, died, and sometimes even paid for. Fight back against the Reconquista—don't let generations of your ancestors' blood and sacrifice be lost in vain.
